BACKGROUND ON BUSINESS

Saudi Arabia: Our Partner In Commerce

Saudi Arabia, a nation that is one of America's largest trading partners—it imports $20 billion worth of goods a year from the US and Europe—is taking steps towards a stronger economy that will benefit its people, and citizens of the US, as well.

To those who question whether government support and a free market philosophy can coexist, the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia can answer with a resounding yes, and point to the work of Saudi Basic Industries Corporation (SABIC) as evidence. SABIC, established by Royal Decree of the Saudi Arabian Government in 1976, is the cornerstone of an unprecedented industrialization and manpower development program which is transforming the Kingdom from a commercial to an industrial economy.

SABIC was also conceived as a bridge across which the Kingdom could exchange technology, products and ideas relating to the production of petrochemicals with the world at large. Its goals include supplying chemicals of competitive quality, competing fairly in global markets, providing competitive pricing, reliability of supply, technical backup and customer service, and maintaining a record of profitability to assure customers of the company's permanence in the world chemical marketplace.

SABIC's belief in cooperation begins with the joint venture approach, in which it co-owns most of its plants, usually on a 50-50 basis, with a multinational chemical corporation that markets and consumes internally a percentage of the Saudi product. Some of its joint venture partners are Exxon, Shell, Celanese-Texas Eastern, Mitsubishi and Lucky-Goldstar.

Both SABIC and its major venture partners benefit from the dual advantage of highly efficient production facilities and relatively low raw material and energy costs. For the Saudis, the completion of SABIC's first major projects represents an opportunity to deepen the Kingdom's role in the world community, changing from a supplier of crude petroleum to an equal and independent partner in the international community.

SABIC believes that if other nations also dedicate themselves to such an open exchange of resources and ideas, then we can all prosper.
