Explorer sheds light on the glory of the cave world

BY YANG FEIYUE

A small herd of milu—deer six feet and four female—pursued each other around the area at the Nanhaizi Milu Park, which was founded, bringing another 38 milu back to Nanhaizi Milu Park.

The deer, which combine the features of a horse's face, a donkey's tail, a cow's hooves and a sheep's body, are a rare species of Asian deer native to China. They only numbered about 200 during the Qing Dynasty (1644-1911), but due to hunting and habitat loss, they were endangered. The World Conservation Union classified Milu as a species under the critically endangered category.

In 1980, the Nanhaizi Milu Park was founded in Shandong Province, China, to protect and restore the species. Since its establishment, the park has been implementing a series of measures to protect the milu, such as habitat restoration, disease prevention, and artificial reproduction. As their number in China increased, more nations started to work together to protect the species.

Zhang Yuqian, 23, could have been a "TV news presenter after four years studying broadcasting and hosting skills at China University of Science and Technology. But instead of pursuing a career in broadcasting, he decided to turn his passion for speaking into a new profession. In 2013, Mr Zhang embarked on his first official spelunking expedition and made his way to the Shuanghe Cave in Wenquan town of Zunyi city and Zhijin Cave in Zhijin county, in Guizhou province.
