Haiti's Aristide deserves full U.S. support

Lawrence Pezzullo, the man who was fired by President Clinton for his inability to find a solution to the military dictatorship in Haiti, now offers a plan to undermine the democratically elected Haitian president Jean-Bertrand Aristide by proposing a "regime change" in his Dec. 15 column. U.S. must take lead in developing transition plan for Haiti.

Unfortunately, in all of Pezzullo's years in the State Department, he apparently never learned the simple truth that our government should be in the business of respecting democratically elected governments, not trying to destroy them simply because we don't like the president chosen by the people.

It is a little ironic for Pezzullo to be making these suggestions now, because he was the person who bemoaned the CIA's efforts to prevent the restoration of Aristide during the first coup.

Pezzullo overstates both the violence in Haiti and the opposition to Aristide. He is ignoring that the same forces who prevented Aristide's return in 1993 are now trying to subvert Aristide's second election.

Pezzullo ignores that the struggle in Haiti isn't about Aristide at all. The struggle is about empowering poor people to have some say in their lives. The poor, who represent the overwhelming majority of Haitians, voted for Aristide. Pezzullo would like to call together all the elites in Haiti, who have always opposed Aristide, to have a new coup. And for what end? So that they can pursue the same policies that resulted in 32 coups in Haitian history.

The ironic part of Pezzullo's plan is that he ignores that it is Aristide who has repeatedly called for elections, and it is the opposition that represents virtually no one in Haiti that has refused to participate in elections. Aristide was elected president for a five-year term, which expires in February 2006. If Pezzullo and others don't like that they should do what we do in the United States -- organize an opposition and run for office, not plot the overthrow of the government.
