In a first for Serbia, they introduce licences for electricity storage while those who produce electricity for their own needs are freed of the obligation to obtain licences regardless of whether they sell any surplus electricity to the system.

The law also defines energy poverty as a condition in which a household has no access to fundamental energy services ensuring decent living and health standards.

It also creates conditions for the establishment and operation of energy communities, and novelties include compulsory certification of installers of renewable energy sources systems.

The law also stipulates the adoption of a programme of development and use of hydrogen and a programme of development of production and use of heat energy.
