Is it possible to replicate Syria in Eritrea?

Could a commando-trained, one-thousand-strong man march inside Eritrea with surgical precision to a deserting Eritrean Troops? Could it be done from Kessela, Sudan, the Afar region, or the borders of Tigray, Ethiopia? I leave the decisions to the Experts.

Who imagined Syrian Bashar Al Asad's regime would collapse in nine days without a fight?

Of course, the Syrian civil war is not new news since the Arab Spring of 2013. The Russians, Iran, and Hezbollah came to rescue the Asad's regime with arms, advisors, and foot soldiers.

When Russia invaded Ukraine, in the hopes it would be as easy as invading and annexing Crimea in 2014, hell just broke loose, and the war took an undesired turn.

Russians were preoccupied with a war in Ukraine; Iran was submerged in the battle between Israel and Gaza, with the Yemen Houthis and the Hizbollah in Lebanon, which pulled all their fighters out of Syria to focus on the war with Israel. The Bashar regime was left to stand on its own. The Syrian soldiers refused to give a fight against the incoming rebels. It was a cakewalk inside Damascus. Beshir Al Asad, like many dictatorial coward predecessors, fled to Russia with his family.

Syria and the Eritrean regime are similar in that both are heavily dependent on the Russians and Iran and work together in a tight group to extend their respective dynasties. Isaias of Eritrea is getting involved in many proxy activities, which are easy to notice. Its fingerprint is all over Ethiopia, Sudan, South Sudan, and Somalia. Eritrea is becoming a breeding ground for mercenaries and military training.

Isaias is alone despite his apparent emboldened as a major player in the region, a maker and shaker, with demoralized Eritrean Troops and Eritrean people. The recent peace deal between Ethiopia and Somalia is a significant setback for the Eritrean regime. He and the Egyptian government are scrambling for emergency meetings to demand explanations from Somalia.

The Isaias regime is at its weakest position possible; the world is keeping a close watch, including talking about Eritrean prisons, gross Human Rights abuses, and illegal money collection and money laundering. We were given an evidentiary gift in a silver platter from Ambassador Yohannes of Juba, The Washington Post report of an unlawful fundraiser, the study in Sweden of unlawful collection of 2% taxes and other illegal collection of money from Eritrean citizens. The image of prisoners in Syria has triggered a call to free Eritrean prisoners by the American government, thanks to majority whip Senator Dick Durban of Illinois.

It requires our focus and resort to action. We ought to only spend time on talks that materialize. Our emotions are our worst enemy and involuntarily serve and prolong the regime's life in Eritrea. Transitional Eritrean Government In Exile, as the only realistic representative of the Eritrean people, we are focused on using our research and Development Department with laser precision on the Eritrean regime activities. Our sole enemy is the Eritrean regime and its followers.
