To be resilient also means to be prepared for the challenges the world brings. Finland has long embraced a mindset of preparedness, shaping its society to protect critical infrastructure and maintain the Finnish way of life.

With the ongoing transformation of the world's security landscape, Finland is developing digital technologies and solutions that strengthen the country's resilience. Much of this work builds on longstanding Finnish strengths in cybersecurity, telecommunications, automation and public-private sector cooperation.

"With the deterioration of the world's security architecture, the Finnish know-how in building resilience is important to the international community. There is a lot of local innovation happening and our companies are open to collaboration," says our colleague Kirsi Kukko, Head of Defense and Digital Resilience program at Business Finland.

Finland is inviting international companies to share in these efforts and offers a collaborative environment for innovating, testing and deploying technologies that support #resilience.

As a global hub for #6G innovation, Finland is defining how this next wave of connectivity will make our societies more resilient.

"What really sets us apart is the ability to cover the entire chain - from radio technologies and network infrastructure to semiconductors and handsets. We have a powerful R&D ecosystem, innovative companies and supportive government funding. It's a rare combination that makes it easy for international companies to come here and develop their business in this space," says our Senior Advisor Jannes Tuomaranta.

Finland is already laying the groundwork for the forthcoming 6G era of wireless communications. "6G technology holds immense potential for strengthening digital resilience against i.e. natural disasters," explains Pekka Rantala, Head of 6G Bridge Program at Business Finland.
