Statement from Counsel for Eduard Khudainatov and Millemarin Investments Ltd.The following can be attributed to Adam Ford, counsel for the claimants:

Mr. Khudainatov views the court's ruling as a clear miscarriage of justice. The decision relies on a flawed interpretation of standing that prevents him from defending his rightful ownership of his property. Rather than engaging with the overwhelming evidence supporting his claim, the court has relied on procedural technicalities to shield the U.S. government's unlawful actions from meaningful judicial scrutiny.

This ruling is legally and factually unsound. It misapplies standing doctrine to deny Mr. Khudainatov access to the courts, setting a dangerous precedent that property can be seized and disposed of without affording the rightful owner due process.

While the yacht is currently within U.S. jurisdiction, any attempt to sell or transfer it under the authority of this ruling may not be recognized as legitimate outside the United States. If the vessel is taken beyond U.S. waters, its rightful ownership—and the flaws in this ruling—may be subject to legal challenges in international courts or other jurisdictions that do not recognize the United States' unilateral actions.

We are fully confident that this decision will not stand on appeal. However, while we will continue to fight this injustice through the U.S. legal system, we are also prepared to challenge any illegitimate sale or transfer through international legal channels. This is not just about reclaiming what is rightfully Mr. Khudainatov's—it is about upholding fundamental principles of property rights and due process that extend beyond the reach of any single government.

This fight is far from over. Mr. Khudainatov remains resolute in his commitment to reclaiming his property, and we will continue to pursue every available avenue—both within the United States and beyond—to ensure that justice prevails.
