

Please Help Yemen

I have devoted my life to helping people. As a pastor, I have endeavored to bring hope and inspiration where it is needed. Right now, it is needed like never before in Yemen.

The world's largest humanitarian crisis is unfolding in this impoverished Middle Eastern country. Children there know of only sickness and death, war and starvation. The tragedy deserves our collective attention and requires our collective action.

Few Americans have heard of Yemen; even fewer know of its misfortune. It is my sincere hope that this will change, and that the world will help Yemen rather than ignore it.

Yemen's disaster stems from a civil war that has been raging since 2014. More than 10,000 have been killed, over 3 million have been displaced, and 17 million are food insecure.

Amid the calamity, 80 percent of Yemen's population of 28 million now requires humanitarian assistance.

The most precious and vulnerable have suffered the most. Since March 2015, over 1,000 children have been killed and some 1,600 have been injured. Two million of them are "acutely malnourished and at grave risk of dying." Senseless violence permeates young lives. For instance, a U.S. journalist reported of meeting a boy who stood outside of his home on a landmine and had his leg blown off.

What is altogether maddening is that Yemen's catastrophe is entirely man made. An ongoing and indiscriminate air campaign in the civil war has decimated homes, schools, hospitals, markets and basic infrastructure.

As such, more than 55 percent of Yemen's health facilities are closed or only partially functional, and some 15 million people do not have access to basic health care. Approximately 14.5 million do not have safe water and sanitation services.

These are the perfect conditions for disease to spread like wild fire, and a massive outbreak of cholera has emerged, resulting in more than 900,000 suspected cases and more than 2,000 related deaths since April.

While cholera is preventable and treatable, the people of Yemen are not receiving the aid they desperately need. The delivery of supplies and assistance from international relief organizations has been made difficult to impossible due to a blockade of Yemeni ports resulting from the civil war. Making matters worse, a temporary closure of ground, sea and air ports of entry took effect in recent days and has effectively sealed off the country.

Meanwhile, precious children and innocent civilians continue to suffer. Yemen's gruesome picture is painted with the dead, hungry and sick, and it is heartbreaking.

Yemen needs America's and the world's attention. We must speak out for those who have lost their lives and those who have had their lives destroyed by this vicious civil war.

I was recently asked to become ambassador to Yemen Crisis Watch, a new organization that seeks to raise awareness about the country. I agreed without hesitation. As a believer in Christ, I have preached throughout my career—on television, on radio and at churches—that we must help others who languish in fear and hopelessness.

From the comforts of our homes in America, we can donate to international aid organizations, such as CARE, the International Medical Corps and numerous others, that provide the relief services the people of Yemen so desperately need.

We must also urge the United Nations to take immediate action and intervene more forcefully to allow for the safe passage of food, medical supplies and urgent medical care in Yemen.

The largest humanitarian crisis in the world that most Americans have never heard of is taking place in Yemen. We cannot look away from this tragedy. I hope that you will pray for Yemen and her people, and join me in doing what we can to help.
