Bill Greenwalt

As the security environment becomes increasingly complex, strengthening the defense industrial base and building more resilient allied supply chains have become critical priorities for both the United States and South Korea.

Join us for a timely discussion on the future of U.S.–ROK defense industrial cooperation, including opportunities for co-development and co-production, stronger defense supply chains, defense acquisition reform, and the integration of commercial and dual-use technologies into national security.

The seminar will also explore technology transfer and industrial policy considerations, as well as key policy priorities for building a stronger and more sustainable U.S.–ROK defense industrial partnership.
