"It wasn't formal, it was two dinners," Mellor said. "In total they lasted maybe four hours, four and a half hours."

Mellor said he was invited by "island entrepreneurs" and that the conversation revolved around business, Cuba's future and possible changes on the island.

"He absolutely wants to update and bring Cuba to the 21st century in business and political," Mellor said of Raul Castro's best-known grandson, who has been at the center of Havana's talks with Washington.

The meeting comes amid a moment of heavy pressure from the United States on the Cuban regime, when the Trump administration applies new sanctions against GAESA, Miguel Díaz-Canel himself and his relatives, as well as a son and grandson of Raúl Castro.

Mellor clarified that he traveled as a private citizen and candidate for Congress, not as a representative of the U.S. government. He also said the White House has not contacted him about the meeting.

One of the most striking moments of the interview was when Mellor claimed that Rodriguez Castro "is totally open" to talks with the U.S. president and to "let Trump lead the way."

El candidato también dijo que fue invitado a regresar a Cuba para nuevas conversaciones, posiblemente este mismo fin de semana.

Todo sucede mientras crecen las expectativas sobre un posible cambio político en Cuba y la isla se sume en una crisis económica y social sin precedentes.
